Chinese Tang Dynasty, Emperor Xuanzong made no mention of the theory in the Shujing but in his work on geometry, the Chain yu Fang (also known as Confucius's Mirror of Watery Depths or Watery Depths Mirror), Emperor Shunfu advocated the theory.[2] Wang Zhen explains the theory as the discovery of the fundamental principle of the nature of water on the basis of the Sunzi's Art of War book.[3][4] With the help of the practice of water, the Emperor set up a system of laws and regulations for people to pursue happiness. [5] Wang Zhen's Art of War Book Expounds the Revealed Secret of the Natural Worthy Prince, Emperor Shunfu. The Art of War text on geometry, the geometric Shang Shu, has a similar statement: "The geometric patterns and the Sun, the moon, stars and earth all share a resemblance. Each of them has such a basic structure that it can be clearly seen.. This principle remains with us.

To be sure, we must take the complicated and treat it as the simple. When we are able to look around and see its nature, then we can see how the heavens and earth are alike and form a unity of root, eye, ear, mouth and nostril. When we focus our eyes and think, all things are contained in one; when we use our ears to hear, all things are unified in one. When we use our mouths to speak, the whole world is united in one, and when we use our nose to smell, the whole world is united in one. What is the use of the knowledge of the nature of water, except to be able to explain the relationship of the celestial ruler and the terrestrial ruler?" The intellectual contributions in the art of war of Sun Tzu and Wang Zhen, entitled Water, are different. Sun Tzu refers to the basic unity in its physical and natural essence, Wang Zhen refers to the overall scheme of the scope of its manifestation, and the comprehensive explanation of the nature and study of water. These two figures have had a huge influence on the development of philosophy, especially those who have been raised and trained in the Chinese military are often fond of the theory of the water.[6] The classical geomancy theory also embodies this theory of the relationship between the nature of water and the nature of the universe.

The ancient geomancy theory is the
